1. Except for a large administration building no buildings were seen at the large airfield north-northwest of Riga, Latvian S.S.R., west of the Daugava River.
2. Young Air Force soldiers working on the aircraft parked in the open were often seen at the field.
3. Among the parked aircraft were 30 to 40 twin-engine aircraft fitted with radial engines and a double rudder assembly, painted a silvery color, and several single-engine low-wing monoplanes similar to the ME 109.
4. The twin-engine aircraft made scheduled commercial flights in all weather. Formation flying with up to 18 twin-engine planes was also seen. Three of these planes would take off at the same time and the formation would return after about 2 1/2 hours. Sometimes the formation were escorted by individual single-engine low-wing monoplanes. Individual parachute jumps made from biplanes in the early morning hours or in the evening were also noticed. Four parachutists once jumped in succession from a twin-engine plane.
